"No Place To Live"

One-reel Star Comedy

A VICTIM of the housing shortage, Egbert finally manages to rent half a house for $500 a month. The landlord promises him that Mrs. Egbert's desire for a fruit tree on the premises will be fulfilled. Egbert, wifey, Egbert, Jr., and the baby arrive at their new home and incur the wrath of their husky co-tenant.

They find the house is jerry-built and all the fixtures fall down almost as soon as they are looked at. The door falls down, the window drops out, the ceiling collapses, and the walls buckle out. The "elegant furnishings" turn out to be a framed chromo and a kitchen chair.

To drown their sorrows, Egbert beheads the "baby," which turns out to be a demijohn full of hooch. Made brave by a few drinks, Egbert boldly goes into his neighbor's room and appropriates his bedclothes. He is caught but escapes by pretending he is walking in his sleep. He makes another attempt and evades some water traps which his husky neighbor has laid for him. Lying down for a well-earned rest, he is driven out of doors by the pesky mosquitos.

He lies under the fruit tree, consisting of every sort of fruit, from a cantaloupe to a banana tried on to an ordinary maple, and the heaviest of the melons falls on his head, sending him back into the house. He is so sleepy he falls asleep with his head on a tub of water outside the neighbor's room. Egbert snores so heavily that he snorts a stream of water right out of the tub into the neighbor's bed.

The husky neighbor, thoroughly doused, chases Egbert into the cellar. As they are fighting a huge pipe bursts and Egbert is about to drown when he wakes up and finds his son playing a hose on him. His wife rushes up and joyfully tells him she has obtained a lovely house for the small sum of $25 monthly.
